Be a Word Detective

What sound does each letter make in this word on the cereal box? Research suggests that seeing print, saying the sounds, and hearing the sounds while pointing at the letter with a parent or teacher has the greatest impact on learning "phonemic awareness" or sounds.

Go on an alphabet scavenger hunt

Tell kids to go find objects that have short vowels. To make this game take longer, designate spots for them to bring each item back—one at a time. Every item must be approved before they can move on to the next.

Draw pictures from letters

Using letters as a starting point, teach kids how to draw. If this is too difficult at first, just write a letter and then draw a picture around the letter.

This type of poetry, known as acrostic, encourages word associations and playful nonsense. Your child's name becomes the "spine" word. Each letter of her name is a seed for a new word. Invite her to think of words that begin with each letter — the new words can relate to her name, things she loves to do, or nothing at all.

On separate pieces of paper Interview your parents and grandparents(if possible). Ask your parents to name the fun things he or she did when they were your age.

Then if possible ask the same question of your grandparents or use Tuesday's video to answer the question. Next write down the fun things you like to do. Finally place the sheets of paper side by side and compare them.

PHONICS

Sight Words

Write a sentence using each sight word. Use finger space, punctuation, neat handwriting, sound out unknown words, and use an uppercase letter at the beginning.

On a sheet of paper, complete various word sorts such as: the number of syllables in each word, number of vowels in each word, number of letters in each word.

Write your sight words in ABC order.
